industriously, conscientiously and courtecusty. The policemen are keyed up to a vigilant performance of their duty by the fact that they are to do rightly what the official enumerators did so badly as to call for this recount.

That the public is interested in the new census and rather likes the big fine fellows who are counting noses through the town is shown prefty clearly by the way in which they meet the policemen more than half way in their endeavor to get the points needed.

There are no annoying questions asked and there is a reason for every one that is put, which is more than can be said of several of those propounded by the late.

A correspondent asks: "Is it anything more than a theory that woman ages score than man r". I think so, I am a firm believer in the good old theory that it is our duty to rear as many children as the Lord will provide.

Some of the "tough" citizens, those of whom homace could truly say: "Nos numerical summs," that is, "we are of no account except to be counted," refused the policement the information asked for just to enjoy the luxury of bucking against an officer with entire immunity, but the police were so undisturbed and pleasant over it that they soon fell into line. The census this time is going to be a success.

I do not believe in too great difference in years, for a man generally has great ideas of his superiority, and with a young wife he is and to think himself master.

"How do you address the Duchess ?" "Your Grace."
"And the Dake?"
"Your Disgrace."

"Do Werden and Blow speak now?"

They Speak.

"Oh, yes. This morning I heard Worden tell Blow that he ought to get himself indicted for libeling humanity."
